

In the space of a generation, qualitative empirical methods have moved from the margin to the mainstream in many areas of basic and applied social science. A subsequent development has been the growth of mixed methods, as the combination of quantitative and qualitative methods gains increasing acceptance. This lecture surveys these development and considers their implications for the present day training of researchers.

20. sociologický večer

> Methodological developments in social science, and their implications for training researchers <

Host: Prof. Keith Punch, The University of Western Australia

středa 29. 10. 2008 od 18:30

budova Hollar, místnost č. 215 -----

